Defender of the Faith was rowdily condemned by various Jewish establishment figures and by readers of The New Yorker who cancelled their subscriptions.. This could happen many times in life, where when some one tries to help another, only to find that they themselves are being exploited, as well as everyone around them.. Sergeant Marx, for the first part of the story, would generally try and help Grossbart, perhaps feeling slightly inclined to do so due to their religious ties; however by the end of the story, Marx has seen through Grossbart's guise and refuses to let Grossbart get away with anything else.. Sergeant Marx dilemma was, having to choose between basing his decision of acting on Grossbarts actions, on his religious principals or his military training.. He comes to these dilemmas often in the story, involving minor situations such as the G.. Why does the narrator Sergeant Nathan Marx say he is “fortunate enough” to travel “the weirdest paths without feeling a thing”? He wants us to know that he is world-weary and life-hardened, a man who “has seen it all,” but in fact. lit Pave Software
